Chapter One: The Lamp

The lamp was still burning when the ferry reached the far bank. Nobody on the pier moved, and the water kept its own slow account of the night.

A reader who listens rather than looks needs the words to arrive in order. One paragraph should follow the last without a pause long enough to suggest that the reading has stopped.

Chapter Two: Morning

By morning the fog had lifted, and the town looked smaller than it had in the dark. The ferry pulled away with nobody aboard but the crew.

The second chapter exists so the chapter list has somewhere to go. A sleep timer set to the end of a chapter must stop here, not in the middle of the next page.

Chapter Three: The Crossing

The crossing back was quiet. The same water, the same pier, and a different reader waiting on the bank.

Headings become chapters when a document has no outline. A large bold line is the signal; running text set in the same size is not.